On the cusp of leaving a city forever, an artist surveys her surroundings. Natalie Curtis, in possession of an extensive Manchester archive, sought to produce one final set of images in the place she has lived the longest.
An antidote to an overwhelming body of work, this exit project is intended as a separate and self-contained piece.

Now widely considered the UK's second city, as Manchester's profile grows - a Prime Minister's office, a G20 Summit and so on - the physical town grows upwards. It is the experience of the glazed concrete forest with which Curtis concerns herself. But rather than the controversy of the contemporary high-rise, her interest lies in the every day domestic. To document what is, compared to the more familiar world of converted flats in Victorian houses, a very different type of accommodation.

In this project we find the otherworldly strangeness of living so high up. A routine more akin to a faraway outpost, the logging of the weather and conditions. Indeed, there is a feeling of science fiction, that mix of the shiny new and old, the photographs having been shot on 35mm. Isolated from the street, we see that amidst the noise and hedonism, there is a silence and solitude. The situation presented for the viewer to decide.
